How does Owen use language to explore the harsh realities of war

It indeed aims to expose the war-time propaganda of World War One. It almost appears comical when the mere prospect of Owen's exposure is contrasted to the pro-war propaganda of the time. Owen is a monotone and somber voice to the romanticised perceptions of war at the time. Society was largely ignorant of the realities of the war and Owen felt duty bound to expose what he believed to be truth about war based his own experience:

The poem tells of the harsh weather conditions the soldiers experienced and the anxiety caused simply by being present at war. Owen effectively explains the harshness of the war by his blunt phrasing – in this way, Owen's message is never rarely ambiguous. The first line of the poem begins: "Our brains ache in the merciless east-east winds that knives us..." This dramatic image clearly describes the physical pain that Owen and his soldiers experienced. Being an opening line, it adds to the dramatic effect of the poem and by shocking the reader, immediately awakening them to the realities of war.

Owen's lexical choice in using the phrase "brains ache" creates an impartial image in the mind of the reader evoking both shock and to a lesser extent empathy for the soldiers. This is followed by the word "merciless" creating a deeper emotional connection between the soldier and the reader. The use of this word personifies the wind as an enemy attacking the soldiers and gives an impression of the wind's harshness. The fact that the wind is attacking from the east is a further attempt to personify the wind as it seems like a strategised attack, which of course is clearly absurd but highlights the psychological trauma of warfare.

The troops have become emotionally strained and even paranoid that they believe that the wind is attacking them. At this point, the reader cannot help but feel Owen's anguish as he has detailed it so clearly through his use of direct language. Then the word "knife" is the final emotional blow that again explains the harshness of the wind. In conjunction with the word "cold" it is implied that the main experience of frostbite which was a common ailment in the snow-tided trenches of the bitter winter of 1917, in which the poem is set. "iced" refers to the coldness of the wound and "knife" alludes to the sharp pain produced by the wound.

The use of an implicit meaning in an otherwise very direct line means that the Owen's claim is clear and yet not over-stated and because the reader infers for themselves the implications of this phrase and thus the severity of Owen's pain. The reader believes that they have arrived at the conclusions of the severity of Owen's pain themselves, as opposed to simply being told by Owen, thus it appears more credible to the reader and the reader is more likely to believe and appreciate Owen's claims. So through Owen's direct and yet slightly understated style the reader is persuaded to believe Owen when they are told of the harshness of war.
