This book examines the relationship between stabilization and human security in UN peace operations. It argues that stabilization efforts must be designed to promote human security, and that human security should be a central goal of all UN peace operations.

The book begins by defining stabilization and human security, and by discussing the different ways in which they are related. It then examines the history of stabilization and human security in UN peace operations, and analyzes the challenges that have been encountered in trying to promote human security in stabilization contexts.

The book concludes by arguing that stabilization efforts must be designed to promote human security, and that human security should be a central goal of all UN peace operations. It also recommends a number of ways to improve the effectiveness of UN peace operations in promoting human security.
