Huntington argues that the fundamental fault lines of global conflict are not primarily ideological or economic, but rather cultural and civilizational. He identifies eight major civilizations: Western, Islamic, Confucian, Japanese, Hindu, Slavic-Orthodox, Latin American, and African.

According to Huntington, these civilizations are defined by shared values, beliefs, and institutions. They are also characterized by a sense of identity and a willingness to defend their interests. As the world becomes increasingly globalized, these civilizations are coming into closer contact and competition with each other.

Huntington believes that this clash of civilizations is the defining characteristic of the post-Cold War world. He argues that the major conflicts of the future will be fought between civilizations, rather than between nations or ideologies.

Huntington's theory has been widely debated and criticized. Some scholars argue that he oversimplifies the nature of global conflict and ignores the role of other factors, such as economic inequality and political instability.
