The UN Offensive was the largest and most ambitious military campaign of the Korean War. It was launched in October 1950 with the goal of driving North Korea out of South Korea and reunifying the country. The offensive was initially successful, and the UN forces quickly recaptured much of the territory that had been lost to North Korea. However, the Chinese intervened in the war in November 1950, and the UN forces were eventually forced to retreat.

The UN Offensive was a turning point in the Korean War. It marked the end of the UN's hopes of a quick and decisive victory. The war would continue for another two years, and it would ultimately end in a stalemate.
